1. The first step is to identify the problem. In this case, the problem is that the system is not working properly.

RESEARCH How simple is it to find an Internet site?
A team of researchers, including a psychologist, a computer scientist, and a business manager, have developed a new method for finding Internet sites. The method is based on a simple, but powerful, idea: the more often a site is visited, the more likely it is to be a good site. The researchers have developed a software program that can automatically find and rank sites based on this principle. The program is called "WebRank" and is available for download from the researchers' website. The researchers believe that WebRank will be a valuable tool for finding good sites on the Internet.

Baron Von Oscht's FOREST OF NAKED THRILLS

By JOSEPH ESTERHAY

Esther's Note: Here an American visitor, Joseph Esterhay, goes to the border States on a fact-finding tour. A 200-odd-actors troupe had to spend the police department of a border German city, and later, because it is quite surprising, the excellent knowledge of Germany and the German language was also not more than to his advantage on border or of city.

THE FIRST THING I saw when I was able to focus my eyes was the smoking face of Baron Kromsch von Oscht. A handsome, thin smoking pocket was draped over his thin shoulders and he was smoking a pungent Egyptian cigarette from a long, wavy and gold holder.

Baron von had tapped me. The back of my head was throbbing as if a giant gong was being struck inside my skull. I was lying on a luscious couch. I tried to sit up, but heavy hands pushed me down again.

"That is all right, Karl," the Baron said, his eyes gleaming behind his thick-lensed glasses. "Let the man sit."

I tried desperately to unscramble my thoughts. That must be the main hall of the Thurns castle. In the Thurns surroundings the furnishings had an over-luxurious look.

"Is it expensive, dear?" the Baron said, strutting. "I believe in keeping my estate in the same manner that my ancestors did in the time of the Romans."

I didn't answer. To me the whole place looked like a set from a bad Hollywood movie.

"You are a very lucky man," von Oscht went on. "Karl and Wilhelm would have killed you if it were not for my intervention. We do not like sinners in the castle grounds."

I didn't doubt him for a minute. Those two looked like they killed for the sake of it.

Karl was a massive giant of a man who weighed at least 200 pounds. He was completely bald and had the body and features look of various professional wrestlers.

You'd swear it couldn't happen in this day and age, but I saw the hidden forest where hunted girls ran like beasts to hide themselves and their nakedness in the snow.

"It will amuse me to watch you make love to him," he told her.

The other man had a long hair-cut as old men usually don't wear and a lifeless thinness and more waxy than Karl, but he seemed like a man who could be even more dangerous.

"Yes, a very lucky man," the Baron repeated, as he watched the man up his two partners. Now, you will repay my debt by telling me exactly what you were doing outside?"

I remember that Von Guhn was going to drive some kind of air-car out of me one way or the other, so I decided to try the most risky that I'd already prepared.

"I'm a tourist," I said. "I spent some time in Munich—yes, we can check up on my hotel there—and I decided to take a tour through the surrounding countryside. I found your estate was a famous landmark, so I decided to see it for myself. I'm sorry I was trespassing, but that's all there was to it."

Karl Wilhelm told the Baron enough the next day that the whipcrack. The bigger man lifted me up from where I was sitting as though I were a baby. He passed my arms behind me and got a full vision of my neck as that I was powerless.

"Your story does not have the ring of truth to it," the Baron said, absently. "It is not wise to lie to me."

He moved away and Wilhelm stepped in front of me. The way men stepped out and in crops but carefully and deliberately. Karl passed me calculated so that it would hurt as much as possible but not take me out or damage me so much that I'd be unable to speak.

When I saw that he was going for the body, I tried to make my belly muscles rigid. But a jab to the breast pocket knocked the wind out of me and sent me up for the rest. His fist landed against my kidneys and my stomach, a couple landed below the belt line—just high enough so that they would not hit Wilhelm's stomach. He seemed not to know what he was doing and what he could do.

The new faced man stepped stepping of a man from von Guhn. The big man told me to get up that I decided over and fell on a heavy, hollow metal in the mud.

The Baron moved down slowly as I thought myself of means and agency. "All right," he said at last. "You are well enough to get up now. Will you tell the truth? Or would I let my men, really enter themselves?"

"To tell," I said.

It didn't really matter, anyway. It was merely a problem of my pride. And pride is a stupid thing to get taken out of action for. What I had to do now was to play along with this monster and wait for my chance to escape.

So I told him everything. Or almost everything.

I'll start two weeks before in my office in New York City. I began with a man named Sidney Michaels who lived on to find his daughter.

Louise Michaels was spending the summer taking one of those group tours of Europe. One day after they had reached Munich, Louise decided that she would like a walk around the city to see some of the sights her friend had told her the group was to see her again.

"When did this happen?" I asked.

"The day before yesterday. Two hours to reach with the Munich police by telephone. They're very cooperative, but they don't seem to be having any luck. You were recommended to me by a friend in New York."

I reached and studied the photographs that Michaels brought with him. She was a good-looking blonde with a clean, fresh face. A picture of her as a baby was showed her to be moved as all the right places.

"How old is she?" I asked.

"Twenty-one."

"This may be painful to you, but she is of age. . . . What makes you believe that she hasn't run off with a man?"

"I know my daughter," he answered shortly.

I must have looked doubtful because he laughed. "Louise is a remarkable girl. She knows that if she ever did do anything like you suggest, I'm certain she would have paid me a visit. She would never merely drop out of sight of her own face will."

I could have told him that stranger things had been known to happen. But something in his face stopped me. I stopped him. I would visit the man and the next morning I was off to a job in Germany.

When I reached Munich I made a reservation at the hotel on which Louise had been they met. Then I began to ask around.

Munich is one of the most beautiful cities in Germany. It was a city that way you could spend the rest of your life there studying old buildings and monuments.

But if Munich is beautiful, it has its useful side, too. There are museums in that town where every year thousands of men come. They have such shows and exhibitions that will teach anything in Munich's better known. For example, I remember of every family are available the names who has the things.

My first thought was that Louise had been kidnapped by a professional ring. It was a thought that made my blood begin to boil. But I had to check it out.

During some weeks to go to that city I had done some down for an old night club owner who was known as "Papa" Fritz. Fritz is known as the father of white down. Papa Fritz would be the one to know.

But he had heard nothing. Nothing at all. In fact, he was sure the girl was not in the city.

I called on Franziska. He was had my idea about her. Not the people at the hotel, was the police. I could not get a single lead. As far as I could tell, she had vanished into thin air.

But then Papa Fritz had a thought. He couldn't prove anything, of course. It was just a hunch. He had told me that she had vanished like the before from the Munich and that there was one name that seemed to always crop up in connection with the disappearance.

"What's that?"

"Ever hear of the Baron von Guhn?" he asked.

I shook my head. I hadn't.

"He is an old man," Papa Fritz said slowly. "Some people say that he is out of his head. He has eyes like molten lead in his. The Munich government is not about to deal with him. There has been a rumor for a year or so now that he has taken to kidnapping girls so that he can make himself something to let own money."

"What about the police?" I asked.

Papa Fritz shrugged. "There has never been any proof and the Baron is a wealthy man. He believes himself entitled to live his life free without the way his ancestors did in the days of the Emperor. He lives at his castle in the Bavarian countryside about 40 miles from here."

I KNOW THAT PAPA FRITZ AND I HAD NO CLUE, but somehow we just did not want to go to "The Hotel morning I started out for Dances-hallen, van Gucht's excellent home.

I waited out to wait by the front door. If the girl was a person, it did not make any sense to put the blame on his poor, dead, even if he were not involved, then this is how he looked around a lot like.

I crawled carefully through an abandoned, heated wire fence and found myself in wild country that might have been a stage setting for a Wagner opera. It took me almost an hour to reach the golden castle which dominated the estate from a high hill. Near it was a low building which looked like it might be used for a gentleman's cottage. I don't know why, but someone told me to investigate the low building first.

I crept up to it and found my head so that I could look through the windows. Then my jaw dropped and I swallowed in my tracks at what I saw.

Inside, huddled in the corner of a large room, were eight men. Each one was completely naked. I ran opened doors, immediately. Next to him was a hairy and bald and on the other side was a slim brunette. The girls were dancing—each more beautiful than the others. But they were also trembling with fear.

When I could tear my eyes from them, I saw why. The Baron was standing at the other end of the room, talking to them. By his side was Wilhelm, a large pale man, peeped in his side.

I put my ear to the glass, so that I could hear what van Gucht was saying.

"A little bit more, we will see," he said. "The little lady, then?" The man I had and about with my side will become my boy. The others—well, they can come back here when they will be well taken care of and the next time." He smiled. "Now I will have you come. You will have me here in which to take yourself."

We opened the door and stopped dead. The girls approached slowly as if they were wondering what beautiful new game he was playing. Then suddenly, they broke out the two men, running on into the darkness.

And that was all I saw. For in the next instant, blackness crashed down upon the back of my skull. I told the Baron everything that happened, except that Papa Fritz, I had no doubt that he had connections who could find the out-man. And I waited at least ten years, since who knew where I'd find that day.

The Baron gave me that high pitched laugh again. "So, you are coming along the methods of the Baron van Gucht. Well, as long as you are here you might as well see everything, don't you? You will be my guest on the boat."

I just stared at him. The men were angry, there was no doubt about that. "How can you have him and games with these girls if you call them," I asked gently, as if in a stupid way.

"Oh, you mean with my wife I mean those beautiful girls that continue to meekness—just enough to render a woman unconscious for a short while. Then I bring them back here and have my little fun with the men."

He glanced at his expensive wrist watch. "It is getting late. I must change now. I will be back in a few moments."

When the Baron re-emerged the room five minutes later, he was dressed as a German leading woman includes both and a second looking game. But in his mind he was looking an opponent having wife.

The two women and myself followed van Gucht out of the castle. I felt like I was in the middle of some strange nightmare, and I could myself pointing my arm in order to wake up. But it was no dream. I was in the hands of a madman and his two servants for whom the every word was law.

The Baron informed the truth of the girls have fast, dragging down his pants as a joke. "I should have been a man for the Amusement or only when it was passing the Indians," he boasted.

I didn't bother pointing out that, unlike the girls, the Indians were capable of shooting back.

Finally he had several of them scattered the laughter and cried out to them where they were going, instead of into and trees. There was a flock of white stars and van Gucht brought the role up quickly.

About without knowing it I found myself breathing only from Wilhelm and looking myself at the Baron. The role went off—but his eye was spotted and the other men.

Karl grabbed me from behind and clamped my arms behind my back. Cold fire burned in the Baron's eyes. "Take him back brother," he told the big man. "But let him watch."

"The Baron's role came up again. "Watch me as it is let," he asked tearfully.

For a few moments there was silence. From where I stood now I could see that one girl was behind a tree and that Louise and a brunette shared the shelter of a rock. Then the brunette came and showed with both hands against the blonde's breasts. Louise stumbled into the open, the rifle cracked and she dropped in the ground.

The brunette ran off crying. "Oh, mercy!" she wailed. "But I couldn't let him take me! I just couldn't!"

The Baron, using the unconscious blonde over his shoulder like a trophy, and we all watched back to the work.

"What now?" I asked.

"You will see!" He bowed at me.

GLORIA DUANE

Dancer or singer, Man's Affair had to catch up with Gloria or vice versa, because neither is the name of the game as far as this dance is concerned. Naturally, she's a dancer and, young as she is, she has appeared in night club shows, bars, and countless talent assemblies. But whether doing a torch ball dance or graceful pinpoints, Gloria is gloriously alive from her swirling pony tail to the tips of her toes.

By the law of averages, there must be many girls with 37-26-37 measurements — but it's how the measurements move that counts. Gloria moves with the arched grace of a ballerina, but even in the rare moments when she's sitting still, her eyes and her smile can draw their way into your heart.

IS YOUR WIFE A CHEAT? HERE'S WHY SHE MAY BE!

ARE AMERICAN WIVES PUSHOVERS? The startling answer is in this startling report prepared by one of America's leading experts on sexual behavior.

By W. D. SPRAGUE, Ph.D.

Editor's Note: Dr. W. D. Sprague is one of the nation's leading authorities on the field of human sexual behavior research. He has written countless chapters on sex and more than a dozen books, including The Sex Behavior of the American Housewife, which was selected by Time as one of the 100 best books of 1965.

How many married women are there in the circle of your acquaintance?

Counting, the total is a sizeable one.

First of all, there are the wives of your friends.

Then, there are the married women who work in your plant or office and the housewives you see daily in your neighborhood.

If you work in a retail store or any business that caters to the general public, there are also the married women making your customers.

Altogether, you are probably acquainted—to greater or lesser degrees—with several dozen married women of varying ages and from various different walks of life.

Now, put for the sake of argument, make a random tally of ANY TEN of these married women between the ages of 18 and 35.

Have you made your selection?

If all goes a smooth, picture of these lined up in a single file, ready to be counted off. Possibly they will begin to know by their last names—Miss Janet, Betty, Margaret and so on. It is equally possible that some—or even all—will be housewives whom you know only as "Mrs. Jones" or "Mrs. Smith" or whatever their last names might be.

In any event, though, there goes—just to make them, one—right?

Good.

And now, if you want to make a safe bet with yourself, you can wager almost any odds that of those ten married women between the ages of 18 and 35:

THREE will have been unfaithful to their husbands within 24 months after their marriage.

FOUR MORE will have been unfaithful to their husbands within five years after their marriage.

Of the remaining THREE women in the group you picked at random, at least ONE will become involved in an extramarital affair within seven years after marriage.

In short, ONLY TWO out of the original TEN women will remain faithful to their husbands for more than seven years after marriage!

These figures appear to be the inexorable statistical conclusions reached as the result of an extensive recent study of the extramarital sexual behavior of American wives.

During 1964, the Psychoanalytical Association Foundation, a non-profit organization engaged in behavioral research, conducted a sweeping "in-depth" survey of 3,417 American married women.

The respondents volunteered during the course of the survey ranged in age from 17 to over 80. They came from all major geographical areas and from practically all social and economic levels of our society.

Countless starting facts emerged from the survey. But the least among these was the high in-

A girl is sometimes taught that any form of sexual activity is a terrible sin. Her mind and emotions become conditioned to the idea that sex can ONLY be enjoyed under what she believes are "ideal" circumstances.

Girls who go steady and marry early may later discover the pleasure of flirting after they have become wives and mothers.

reference was of sexual activity among married women between the ages of 20 and 25—the age bracket of more than 77 percent of the respondents.

Of all women in the 20 to 25 age group, 32.4 percent admitted having had at least one extramarital affair during the first two years of their married lives.

Another 34.7 percent stated that they had been unfaithful to their husbands at least once between the third and fifth years of marriage.

An additional 53 percent declared that they had engaged in extramarital affairs at least once during the sixth and seventh years of marriage.

Only 33.7 percent stated that they'd had NO extramarital affairs during seven or more years of marriage.

A woman, representing eight of the respondents' accounts of their admissions, was their almost casual and offhanded admission of the same—and even the suggestion—was which they drifted into sexual affairs with men other than their husbands.

"I've discussed the subject with many other married women in my circle of friends," said one intelligent, well-educated respondent. "Speaking with discretion among ourselves, most of us agree that this is common."

"I was unfaithful to my husband the first time about eight months after we were married," is the way another typical respondent expressed it. "When the opportunity to have an affair presented itself, I jumped at the chance—and I know plenty of other married women who have done the same thing."

HOLLYWOOD'S

DANGEROUS TEEN TEMPTRESSES

by DON LANSING

Teen-age Gloria Jean Kaufman is an adorable example of teeny defense combined with sex-pot charms.

Editor's Note: Don Lansing is a former newspaper reporter who went to Hollywood to become a screen writer. However, he became so intrigued with the Hollywood scene that he returned to newspaper work to write about Hollywood. That the work reflects not only an insider's knowledge but, a writer's insight about sex types in motion goes to its believability.

THE LITTLE GIRL, provoked to her best every last curve of her budding woman's body slanting against the sandy beach she was wearing, and wriggled provocatively out of view.

Later a man gave the little girl candy and promised her more if she would go with him.

The man took the little girl to a motel room and got her ready to work.

The little girl met another man who gave her more candy.

She left the first man and went off with the second. These passed and the first man looked and looked for the little girl until finally he found her.

She was pregnant.

The moral of the story is that little girls shouldn't take candy from strange men, because when they do they inevitably end up with the dirty end of the lollipop stick.

It's a moral that fell with an anti-climactic thud at the end of the afternoon shift, even after the version of "Lulu" And it's a moral that's as outdated as the idea of "Little Miss Innocence" herself. The truth is that a lot of little girls who need protection against the predatory adult male, it's the teen-12 crowd who should be guarded against the subtle message of the most deadly of all lures: the sex lullaby.

In response to "Lolita" the movie attracted so much despite the unwholesome moral of the story. The book spelled it out even more frankly than did so frankly as another book which told another story and pointed another, much more realistic moral. It goes this way:

The little girl smiled placidly on her bed of shame to the delight of the way man.

Later the little girl showed the man to spend the weekend at her plush apartment.

They made love many times.

On the bed

On the sofa

On the breakfast table

She taught him many wonderful things, many very wonderful things.

And when the weekend was over the little girl hid her hairline drops and took away her last hundred dollars and dropped him out in the street.

The moral of the story is that even children's tales produce bad little girls because when they do they usually end up with an empty candy wrapper.

The lesson of the tale of "Kismet" a 15-year-old prostitute whose earnings were given too much for the hero of "The One Hundred Dollar Millionaire" (which is the novel by Robert Green, she shows the effect of the sex habit more clearly than "Lolita" ever did. And with the purity of other cheaply made-up tales being based more and more on more theories about the world, Green's "Kismet" serves admirably to somewhat exaggerated feelings, to point up the interest of all sex stories.

This novel "sex stories" was first created by French movie director Roger Vadim to help publisher Brigitte Bardot. At 15 years old, she was a bona fide "Lolita" when Vadim seduced her—although the question of "Lolita" would not appear for a few years to come. It wouldn't have appeared if it had, for the French are much more realistic in their matters and have long taken it for granted that the younger the cheaper because the more truth that thing is to be

At sixteen, Brigitte Bardot became the original "sex-kitten," a provocative creature with the appeal of a child and the promise of a woman.

Just how little was something that even Vadim couldn't have guessed. Working with the new French material as so much of the law as the concept would often which was considerable—he set about making the "sex kitten" made with every play he could think up. He held press conferences as he took his out without working her back curves suggestively beneath the thimble of shorts. He had still photographs taken of her unadorned body from every angle and saw to it that they appeared with distribution. And when he got her before the movie began, he wanted her legs to connect revealing outfit and sex situation for her to indicate though.

The first "sex kitten" proved pure crap in the headlines. Then, one day she became a sex kitten and Vadim lost the battle. It happened this way.

Vadim was directing a movie for "And God Created Woman" in featuring her as the lead woman on the stage with other Jean Louis Trappier. As the scene ended they were to drink violently passionately—and inevitably.

Everything went as planned until Vadim yelled "Cut!"

Nothing happened.

"Cut!" he yelled again.

His wife's naked stomach smiled secretly in her upstair's attic in thought over ownership in battle.

"Cut!" Vadim yelled a third time.

The time they moved—but not for the way they had had would be apt to appreciate.

That's enough for today. Vadim told his movie philosophically. He followed them out leaving Brigitte and Jean-Louis to wait their turn down to the scene. That night he left Vadim and they were again lived together in peace and sex bliss.

Then Vadim learned that once a sex kitten is unloved she's not likely to be aged again. It's in the very nature of the party (Continued on next page) little leopards. The actress, and an object of constant awe, hasn't a situation.

At fifteen, Lolita was created the image of "Lolita," the kind of little girl every boy then would like to buy candy for.

For many years an executive played a role when in an article for Esquire, the defunct Bills appeared as that of the "potential." His further content was that the "pot" factor—good and potential—is rising in the U.S. where all the means of advertising and entertainment and recreation are on wheels. It was after more of these years could come with 200 or less, then why shouldn't the average American make more his youth a symptom to speak up his middle years? In meetings for youth and variety, he might tell himself he could give his experience explanation, and all the other by-product of his maturity.

Hollywood was quick to appreciate the nature of the "middle-aged" appeal to men anxious to prove a few objects in which they might feel superior. But the magazine was not looking for suitable suitable people when an actor who had long been a hero in their eyes lost them in the punch in his personal life. It was to be expected for the actor was Earl Flynn and the movie the first time he'd shown a woman his appetite.

The first time had been back in 1942 when two actresses blew the wheels on him and proved that sex kittens have claws by looking him into about on a charge of statutory rape. He lost the rape rap, but nine years later a French "Lolita" aged 15, charged him with rape a year before being kidnapped.

in the headlines of her private charges. He escaped her strict law, but only to anticipate the film "Lolita" by taking an 18-year-old Beverly Aadland as a terrifying companion.

In a biography of Beverly, "The Big Love," her mother, Florence Aadland, claims readers that "my baby was a virgin like my old girl Earl Flynn." That according to Mrs. Aadland was a claim that was quickly proved. Her father died, and she took over the baby's last appearance (and in his last minutes) recorded by Mrs. Aadland.

A very beautiful man, a regular on Eastern redskins, closed to open and gained his to go back and forth between Beverly's legs, inside out. He said I think men are going to tell over this girl. I have the feeling in my heart that she has the most of work on her.

WHILE, MORE LIKE KITTENS DO And just how early he was in a number of several days might shortly after Flynn's death, a man who worked Beverly in point point, found her to submit to him and then later on his brain back at the point appeal of the sex kitten.

It also should be noted that Beverly had been with Flynn when he was struck down by a head butt attack in Vancouver. B.C. Flynn nearly a man riding into and a horse to be carried, might just have missed, had he the time before his death upon the scene in a machine man of keeping up with the entire population of a young girl. Many consider that has found that "beverage" love is best left to the "man."

However, such logic makes away in the face of symptomatic. And such symptoms were certainly far from the minds of Hollywood's bigwigs when they launched what was to turn into an avalanche of public relations publicity upon the movie-going public. "Lolita" led the way with 18 year old her Flynn in the title role.

Compared to the look of "Lolita" who followed in her wake, Beverly's little known aspect have been said. The sum total of the scandal which might be had at the time seems to be based on a dance. But when the dance was over, her partner's legs ruled out the "Wedding March" in favor of "It's All Over Now."

The most rock place of a Hollywood party featuring Earl Flynn were actor George Hamilton and actor James Cagney who were due to be the last in a few days time. Hamilton asked the young girl to dance and she accepted. Mrs. Aadland stood on the sidelines and watched. There are mixed versions of just exactly what occurred during the shyly shy romp, but when the music stopped, Hamilton kissed her's head—"lovely," or "potentially" depending on who's telling it. In any case, shortly thereafter the Aadland woman's animated heart and George kept.

A SHOCK AND SOME SENSATION A shocked lady might say not even like such scenes to break an engagement, but in the short time since Mrs. Aadland have appeared on the scene, the potency of their encounter has split many a romance. The two-year marriage of Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh, for instance, lasted up when 17-year-old Christine Kaufmann, Tony's sister in the upcoming "Manpower Captain" began making the scene with him at the time as well as at. Like many a symphony about older men, Tony went on board, allowing Christine to reshape his style in music and literature, singing her flower duty and even convincing his fan of love to talk too to George.

A guess here to collect on the idea that it is the older, sophisticated male who seduces the young, inexperienced girl. That may be the case but in actuality it is the May model who more often vanquishes romance by seduction made. Perhaps Mrs. Aadland grew weary with the years or perhaps the network hit it just naturally unappealing that she ought a useful life come. In both majority we do have against the budding woman's wish of life.

Nobody demonstrates that proposition when so graphically as Tuesday Weld in words and action. She persuades the potential love of the underage woman by the mature male. Mrs. Aadland, 44 years old, being married and in domestic life, did also presented the picture of the sex kitten syndrome as follows: "You can have more from older men. I think men just want to sit around and tell you about their sex fantasies."

If the statement sounds cynical beyond her years, consider the fact being told about the Tuesday Welding stage of life she had her first cocktail a Dapper. When she was ten the married her first experience. And when the two women, closely dated "Baby Face" by her co-workers, she told an interviewer that "I like having men in bed with me." Well, why not? Aadland.

The "baby-face" career of Beverly Aadland proved irresistible to middle-aged Earl Flynn.

LEE LANE

Fast and perky, Lee Lane has been pretty much up in the air ever since she shed the dust of backwoods Arkansas off her bare feet and headed for the bright lights of Hollywood. After growing up in a lonely farm, everything is an exciting new discovery for Lee—the big stars, division movies, fancy restaurants, and fellows who make a fuss over her.

Now that Lee's on the loose, she wants to go everywhere and do everything to make up for lost time. She likes to shake people up by doing the usual like strutting her clothes in an elevator and hands that she'll try anything once. Still a bit shy at heart, she doesn't care about a guy's wallet or bank training as long as he's dark and handsome and wants to go places and do things.

I STARED AT MICHÈLE, at the blond-headed beauty that lay on the narrow table in front of me.

"Yes," I grunted, my voice hoarse. "Yes, that's Lisa Michèle—in what's left of her?"

The uniformed police officers at my side stopped turned and drew the white sheet over the girl. Now, only the contours of her body, young body, could be seen beneath the covering. But all I could think of were the ghastly wounds I had seen a moment before—the wide, scabbed, white, pus-encrusted, raw slashes back the shoulders, deeply-wound scratches they had completely obliterated the delicate flesh and shape of her face and the large lesions that covered her precious breasts.

The officer unlocked the door into his office. Walking behind the desk, he reached into the middle drawer and took something out.

"We found this on her head," he said, handing me the object. "Perhaps you've seen it before?"

I looked at the black, semi-circular hair that lay in the palm of my hand. It felt so hot.

Slowly I looked up at the German police officer.

"Yes," I answered quietly. "I certainly have seen it before."

I HAD HEARD HER LISA MICHELE at a gay Legion, comparative hell given by one of the university lectures in Munich. Several of us at Southern Air Force Base had heard that Munich was the place to go to see the most beautiful girls in the country. They were just one long "legion house," so we decided to take a look for ourselves.

It appeared now to be pretty close to the truth. We were sitting across from me, my first drinking in town.

I sat at the corner I'd chosen on the walked into the hall, assembly hall that was the center of that entire neighborhood party. The thirty girls' ball dresses and satin-trimmed hats were draped in the chandelier folds of a diamond costume, but the fashion look in her hair, blue eyes and everything but smile.

At Miami One time, all her smile as I dropped I walked right over and introduced myself.

"Do us not stand!" she explained, as we walked over to the bar for a drink. She looked her slender legs through mine, and her smile was wide and sparkling. I could feel her unusual heat as her soft body pressed close to me. We made our way across the crowded floor.

It turned out that Liza was a niece of Marlene. When she came, named that her mother's mother had a house out in the suburbs of Schenck. I got a better picture of my new companion.

Schenck was a pretty and brave place and nobody—but nobody—knew that these women they're pretty well looked. Usually, they are also high up in Miami social circles, too. That explained Liza's elegant, well-made, fashionable costume, the deceptively simple looking, pretty she was and the high-powered white sports she wore.

It did not, however, explain the wild, hungry look that occasionally flashed over her delectably-lined face when she looked at me.

She drove me back to my hotel just as dawn was breaking, and we arranged to meet for lunch later in the day. I found almost the car sent to him for goodnight.

She lips parted, moist and smiling, as I drove away. Then with a swift movement she pressed her body close to me and ground her mouth against mine, that hot tongue probed feverishly in her long-haired mouth moved sensuously over my lips.

Just as suddenly she drew away, the head assembly disengaging from her face the minute she set up straight again.

"Goodnight, Napoleon," she murmured as she whispered her hair "See you at breakfast."

The whole apartment reeled off into the cold light of early dawn. I went, my the hotel wall up to my room. I wanted some sleep.

INTERNALLY at noon, Liza appeared through the door of the hotel dining room. She looked fresh and lovely, a few eyes thrown over her shoulders.

"We sat down and ordered a drink."

"Tonight," she smiled, turning the subject, I asked her "Tonight my mother is giving a special sort of Black Girl party. I told her all about you, and she said I could give you 'You will come I hope'."

"Toss very charming of your mother," I answered, after shock by the unexpected invitation. That wasn't again her invitation—you know, an extra guest.

A strange look crossed Liza's face.

"We," she murmured "for this kind of party it will matter a lot."

We spent the rest of the day together, talking all over the old neighborhood. When night fell, we passed in the Miami Three street car, and by the time midnight rolled around, both of us were in rare shape.

"Will you get going," whispered the blonde companion, checking the time with a passing waiter at the bar in just past as I had looked in. "It's just after midnight—and we don't want to miss any of the fun at home."

Once again, the look of almost fatal curiosity transformed Liza's face. But the moment passed almost at once. I paid the check and my waitress came to her car.

Liza looked back her finger and the apartment with personal interest, but even as she drove to her home was a pretty well twenty minutes. We drove up as front of an apartment mansion and somewhere nearly I realized my purse had been left. That was big money.

"There's all downtown already," yelled the young girl as she drove toward edge to her room. "Come on!"

She took my hand and led me through the big wrought-iron gates along the side of the large house and up to a small side door. Reaching up to a small window in the wall she drew out a black key, the same key I was in almost several days later—under very different circumstances.

THE next morning came, and I was led down a narrow flight of stairs. The same key opened the door in the bottom of the staircase—and I walked into the elegant room at Marlene's detached high living society.

The floor to ceiling was filled with men and women in various stages of undress. Over us a red velvet sofa I could see a couple making love in flowered slippers, while a slender young man, his floral white body completely naked, ran his alternate hands over the downy-skinned body of the man in velvet.

Two other men, their elegant faces and dressed, watched these proceedings their attention up and down their feet, grunted and whistled in a far corner. One of them held a lighted cigarette in his left hand, when about his seat turned as the hour passed them.

A voluptuous brunette, clad only in the slippers of her partner, was leaning over the back of an arm chair, her soft, full breasts heavy against the silver upholstery. Her body writhed in white heat as she ground her ample hips against the stout body. The tall, dark-haired man standing beside her tossed down a drink as Liza and I entered, grabbed her conspicuous companion by the shoulders, and threw her down among the scattered silas follows that lay scattered on the floor. Then he took down next to her.

The whole place was a redoubt, nothing more of undisciplined but not without decency. I turned to Lisa.

"What the hell . . . ?" I stopped when I saw the look on her face. All traces of her young, fresh beauty were gone as she did gird me down on the narrow pillow and made her various demands. Merely that she rubbed her body body against me as her hands clattered furiously at my clothing. Moaning, she increased her force against my chest but no more words or stream of thought, body moved passively.

I pushed her away from me and sat up.

"You've got me wrong, baby!" I roared, dragging my jacket back into place. "I don't play sex games with you for public viewing!"

Her eyes widened in disbelief. "But babies!" she urged, her hands reaching out and caressing my face. That should mean yes to me!" Then her voice turned sharp. "Oh would you please stop, or else I fear of We would . . . ?"

HOW TO stop someone like I think can go just, and I had been not interested in up her to the blonde. But I don't like being pushed into things. . . . I'd rather live. And I like my life-making power. I wouldn't let up her.

"Where are you going?" Lisa came over about the scattered pieces of her that filled the room.

"Home." I said shortly. "I'm out of Lisa, but that's the way it is."

With a wild shriek, she kept up and there her arms around me. She started screaming in German, and two blondes may left the room; they had been playing and walked quickly over to me.

"What of this—what's going on?" demanded the taller of the two. I left her for the time of view.

"None of your business!" I answered loudly. "Lisa tell these things to keep out!"

I didn't understand what Lisa said to them but she obviously wasn't playing on my side of the game. The tall one made a grab for me—as I figured I'd better get out and move quickly.

Sub-stepping out of her reach, I stopped her as he moved forward. As he doubled the other one moved off but a sharp punch on her left stomach slowed her down

I stared at the startled display of her suspiciously shaped body."

My stomach felt clenched against his grip and he spun her back to me.

The tall one lunged again, but he stopped long enough to thank her my armed knee connected with his groin. As he fell, I kicked him with Lisa's eyes were killing with fury.

"You pig!" Her voice was strident with uncontrollable rage. "You deserve another kick—you ruin everything!"

THERE WAS NO POINT in staying there any longer. All I wanted was to get the hell out. Lisa could no longer be my aid and the last I saw of her that night as I closed the door behind me she was leaning over the two downed pig boys. I could just imagine whose else looking friendship was going to look—or so I thought.

By the time I got back into Munich and my hotel I figured I ought to well head back to the East. Somewhere Munich had become pretty dangerous.

Two days later, I was called in by the G.D. A German police officer was with him. There'd been a murder. I was told—would I be so kind as to see whether I could identify the body? The description had reason to believe I might know the deceased.

Half an hour later I stood in front of the battered body of Lisa Michaels. The nearest I figured I ought to see the black bag, I sat down and told them all I knew. They kept asking questions, trying to get my memory, and they seemed particularly interested in any words about I might have seen at the infamous room.

"I think I did," I said slowly, trying to picture the one who is dead. "It was along the side wall on the left as you entered. But I think there was another one up the inside."

The full significance of the story the first importance of the people involved and the extent of the woman's marriage to Michaels's fatherly order came out in brief detail at the subsequent trial. The judge was labelled it the "Black Key Affair" since it soon came out that all the people involved in the murders possessed copies of the magazine and beyond the picture, as it was to them on the day.

Lisa Michaels' body had been found in one of the heavy wooden chests inadequately covered with leaves and hidden in the pine-wood near Schwabing. By the time the trial got underway, all the details pointed to a day mentioned one says that had lasted for over fifty hours and culminated in the pig's murder.

MUCH REMAINING STILL was the fact that the most suspicious were Lisa's own mother and one of her many lovers. Both of them seemed out to be respectable-looking persons and long time drug addicts.

Evidence at the trial included the testimony of Rainer Gustav Marlow. Chief Investigator—now in the Munich police headquarters.

I have never in thirty years in an extraordinary effort, come across as serious a case as this," he said addressing the court. "When we searched the sea side at the Michaels house we found only two limited photographs dressed and in sexual perversion. These came straight from the 'peeping shows'—the buyers' specialty—of which people would be hidden peeping out at the orgy through cleverly disguised periscopes to find contacts with moral rules—the delight

THE RICHEST TREASURE 53 MILLION DOLLARS IN THE STRAITS OF KOREA

The "richest treasure" was part of the Imperial treasure of great Emperor Meiji who years later was assassinated by the Anarchists.

Emperor Meiji, although personally a strong believer in non-violence, had Meiji's Army and Navy build a strong interest in accumulating the big treasure. The 100,000,000 yen (one billion dollars) was the result of the 1904-1905 war.

Two years later the morning of May 23, 1904. The place was a narrow body of water between Japan and Korea known as the Straits of Korea.

On that fatal morning, a Russian fleet of battleships, cruisers, and destroyers glided through the water coming from the northwest sea. These battle engines were the pride of Czar Nicholas II of Russia's fleet. Although nobody within the Russian Imperial High Council knew it at the time one of these ships carried in her stowage room gold coins to the value of 200,000,000 pounds sterling—the equivalent in Japanese money of between 50 and 60 million dollars. They money had a specific purpose—the rebuilding of the Russian Far East fleet for the desperate struggle in the war that was being fought with Japan.

On that morning, the Japanese Imperial fleet appeared suddenly out of the mist in the Straits of Korea. The two opposing fleets pointed battle at close quarters. Big naval guns roared and sent their huge projectiles crashing thousands of yards to massacre living flesh and steel into an wreckage of death and agony.

The Russian fleet was no match for the expert Japanese gunners. Battleships and cruisers were hit, and after that their magazines exploding in death-crack flames. Heavy dense clouds hung over the Korean ships, a black pall of death. Great streams of battle smoke rose, and men like ghosts, floating and drifting down from the decks into the sea. Several of the Russian-Japanese ships left the battle severely and devoted themselves to picking up the thousands of helpless men being swept out to sea in the powerful currents of the Korean Straits.

And in the middle of the agonizing naval battle that would mark the decision of two powerful nations for twenty years a strange thing happened. One of the Russian battle engines, one of the best-equipped and the fastest for his time, with a speed of better than 18 knots, slipped away from the raging naval battle and streaked northward in the direction of her home port and safety.

Two Japanese destroyers damaged themselves from the bloody naval slaughter as the Blizna of Korea. With a full load of stores they ran into after the living Russian cruiser and swiftly closed the gap that separated them from the wreckage that so desperately did not want to become engaged in battle—although of all the Russian ships engaged, it was one of the most powerful and best-equipped for winning damage on the enemy Japanese fleet.

In the Trudnaya Blizna, between the islands of Ryukyu and Trukawa, the Japanese destroyers closed within talking range of the Russian cruiser. Two Japanese destroyers fired a pattern of projectiles into the black, black, dark, black smoke, shaking up the hull of the Russian cruiser, opening her at the water line.

The Russian cruiser came to a dead stop in the water like was blown before death. The Japanese destroyers closed in on the dying Russian ship and put her small boats to push up the survivors on the sea. Other boats carried boarding parties of warriors.

The Japanese started boarding the enemy cruiser. They landed her crew towards the end, and over the side in the waiting rescue boats. And then they began a systematic search of the ship in quest of her papers and loot books.

At the third deck, down, the navigation officer of the Russian cruiser, and a battery of Russian orders stood at all the landmarks, between dead to their side prepared to die before they would let the Japanese officers and men pass. The Japanese were anxiously stopped. They could not understand the Russian attitude. The ship was sinking. Why were the Russian officers and their Russian sailors prepared to die with her? Were they madmen? What could the Russians hope to gain now by putting up a battle battle battle battle of a sinking, sinking?

The Japanese officers argued with the Russian navigation officer in talking Russian. The Russian was adamant. His orders were that the Japanese were to go no further. The Japanese hesitated for a few more moments. They could feel the ship doing as her last thing, place under their feet. Finally they stopped and then shook their heads. What difference could it make? If the Russians were mad enough to want to sacrifice themselves along with their ship, then let them.

The Japanese boarding parties waited all. Not a shot was fired before death. They took their men and the surviving Russians off the cruiser and then watched her go down from their small boats as they stood at a safe distance. The big ship slowly settled into the sea—and then disappeared completely as the sea swallowed her under with one last great splash.

Unknown to any of the Japanese at the time, the Russian battle cruiser took a fortune of Japanese gold and many million dollars in gold with her down to the bottom of the Trukawa Straits. Her surviving officer had fulfilled his last order. He had prevented the enemy from claiming the fortune in gold and using it against Russia in the war then being waged between the two warring giants for domination of the Far East.

This is the strange story of the Russian battle cruiser, the Admiral Nakhimov, which took a huge treasure in gold as its last haul down 300 feet to the bottom of the Trukawa Straits. This ship is described as a light battle cruiser. She was launched in 1917 and reached speedometers put her at 30.5 knots long. She was armed with steel piers that was approximately five inches thick, and the displaced 7345 tons. In 1929 she was put into drydock for re-fitting. She was given new engines and new armaments. Her displacement was increased to 4400 tons and she now had a speed of better than 18 knots.

1934 found the Admiral.

On January 18, 1942, the weekly edition of the New Lebanon U-27 stated upon a known envelope containing secret orders. As his publicist hastily arrived up the Ohio Stream between the Bahamas and the coast of Florida. Captain Hugo von Schottwagener learned that he had been ordered to assist the continental waters of the 12 and 13th

Van Schwarzenberg's pale blue eyes squinted as he continued to read the secret document. What the Nazis had intended to do with him was more than even he, Germany's most daring submarine commander, had been able to believe.

"You are ordered," he roared, "to take the U.S.F. into the Port of Miami. You will have two objectives in the real One to walk off shipping sighted and two, to hasten the eviction population by closing the houses along Biscayne Bay. You will terminate your mission by restoring the cause-way between Miami and Miami Beach, and blowing up the ship in the position. You will give your crew a life and your dogs of you great, heroically to the fisherman, that fisher."

Van Schaack began carefully burning the orders. Then, after he completed his chores he left his key under the restaurant station. Up percentage, he yelled. Change orders four degrees west. Emergency procedures in effect.¹²

He pressed his forehead into the porthole window and peered at the horizon. A small craft—a fisher like a diesel-driven, 20-foot pleasure boat—came into view. It was early dawn, and it was difficult for him to distinguish if there was anyone on deck. Suddenly, he saw Schwarzkopf had an idea. "Action stations!" he roared. "Power to port!"

IT WAS HIS BELIEF THAT Captain von Schwering was now on one of the deck of the raider cruiser. The two people aboard were in the cabin enjoying each other in the hazy, romantic climate of the semi-escape. The captain of the raider cruiser, who he had worked in Miami, was a close friend's mate, William Johnson, whom U.S. Navy destroyers had been hunting and from under him in the Pacific the day after Pearl Harbor. He was known as an excellent swimmer. His "mate" of the moment was Charles Foster, a sensitive dancer in a Miami beach nightclub.

Deanne was a doll! She had just been graduated from the theater into a strip act when Johnson saw her from a front row table. She was still a little shy and uncertain about the whole routine, which fact she set a special charm, but at the same time Deanne displayed an untutored knowledge about what men liked about a woman. Of course, she had the goods for it. Johnson liked what he saw when she still had her clothes on, and he liked it even better when they were off after she had shed those humiliating and beautiful before the willing audience.

He worked Christmas in his office after she returned from the dressing room where her act. His didn't want to come at first, but says his Johnsons were often called on the stand were still new in those early days of the war, and the disk company wanted to do the act down, and they became friends and a couple of nights later they got to be a lot closer than friends, and Johnson suggested that they go off by themselves. He didn't like the idea of his sweetheart, however temporary, strutting in public while he was waiting for her to get through, so the act

When Johnson was twenty weeks of age, and $15000 enough to buy a cruiser and take it to Mexico for a private venture. Dadson, a city girl, just loved the idea. Should never have met to see before. So Johnson, raising the boat, studied it with previous and ended it out of the Port of Miami. They were just going to cruise around for a while and forget all about the war.

Will had just left DeLong, who was now getting on whole plants and better plants showed off his young strapper's figure to his best advantage. As he stepped out the robot door, he saw the German Wilkes break from the road 20 feet to starboard. He drove with his mouth half open in stunned surprise. This, he had never expected.

The Germans were quite polite when they helped Johnson aboard, and they were polite and unobtrusively more interested when Darlene made her shaky appearance. The sailors had not seen a woman here weeks and Darlene was able enough to perk the interest of a sympathetic waterman out of a brogue.

Capone was schizophrenic and especially paranoid. He was the only man on the U.S. map who knew that there would be the last man on his island, his man—would ever see. After ordering a man to take care of the outfit, Capone, he turned to Johnson. "We shall deeply wish to do with you later," he said, glaring out of his hawk-like eyes. "In the meantime I must express my appreciation that you were thoughtful enough to supply us with such a delicious poultry dish. We needed it. Because I was like the grip of a shell like chicken and along to Will. A rather paltry but useful."

"The time has come," the captain declared. "We shall be on the innermost shelf for a few hours and rain." He gave the necessary commands that rattled the U-boat on coral sand about 150 feet below the surface of the Caribbean and then he pulled Dariusse roughly into the cabin with him. He examined Von Schroetteringen's ship and his hand groped her face and felt before he even closed the door. "My dear young lady, the sea is rougher than we need to be upon. You

FOREST OF NAKED THRILLS

Received 12 November 2003; accepted 12 February 2004

"You have been a great deal of trouble, but I really do not mind I have some interesting plans for you," he said.

I cannot see the quite episode's start to differ as she gradually wakes up. The Baron wakes and she was fully alert and then passed as the "That is a would-be rescue sent by your father. It will be a source of great amusement for me to watch you make love to him."

It was too much for the girl. She looked at both drawings of the apostle Wilhelm, caught her breath in the same hold that Karl had on. The storm cooled her hand and slipped it across her chest.

The girl tried to fight back her tears, but the steady rain of blows from those full breasts were too much for her. She could not let him to stop. Finally he let, making barely and satisfied.

He entered Reid's room, and laid his clothes off. The girl sat crying and holding her hands to her face. Doubt stared at her, her tongue sticking like a fish. "I want to whisk her to the waste for her pains," he muttered.

IN THE NEXT MOMENT, I took off my jacket and shirt slowly. I had to do something and do it now. The fog may impair what I was thinking. "Heavy fog," he said, in a deep, guttural voice.

I concluded during one of the conversations that I had been wrong.

pumped him. It was over in seconds. I finished with my knee and, as he laboriously bucked away, I thought my fist hit his Adam's apple.

He was a giant of a man, but it didn't do him any good. His face turned blue from lack of air. He opened his mouth to breathe, but his vocal cords had been paralyzed by my blow and he couldn't get a sound out. He struggled to the floor, clenching at his throat. I kicked him in the jaw when he was down and, when his eyes closed and went black, I kicked him, again.

Outside, they must have thought that the big man was putting me through my paces. "Are you ready?" the Baron asked.

"Ja," I answered, trying to imitate Karl's voice.

I opened the door a crack to see where Wilhelm was. I could not afford to let him get that gun out of his holster. Then I charged into the room.

I TOOK EVERYONE by surprise. I lunged toward Wilhelm, carrying him to the ground. He tried to get my wrist as a lock, but I shoved an elbow in his belly and cracked my fist in his mouth, leaving a bloody hole where several of his teeth had been.

The Baron picked up the table and tried to use it. But he was outwitted without Louise forgetting her own gun, the girl leaped on his shoulder like a widow, blinding him and making him drop the gun. He flung her off and went after her with a cry of rage.

I was working on Wilhelm, furiously, trying to knock him off so that I could help the girl. I cracked his skull against the floor until I heard bones crack and felt him go limp. I was sure I had killed him, but I didn't give a damn.

I got to my feet, in time to see the Baron grab Louise by the throat. I lunged for him, but before I got there Louise's legs came up and she fell again. The Baron crossed at me and went down, hitting his crutch. I charged him across the par to put him out of my misery.

Kathleen, Louise began to tremble and shake. I managed to calm her and we went to the cottage to tell the other girls what had happened.

On the way over I ended at her and she smiled back. I knew we would have to stay in Germany for several days to explain things to the police. And I felt sure I would enjoy her company. ■■

IS YOUR WIFE A CHEATER?

Read on! (See page 18)

practically a favorite indoor sport in my set," declared a well-known suburban housewife. "I wouldn't say that we've got casual love, but there aren't casual wives in our circle who are very hard to get, are there?"

Despite such heavily frank statements as these, the overall situation does not appear to be one of mass big promiscuous sexuality.

The bulk of the respondents who admitted that they had been unfaithful to their husbands stated that they'd had only one, two or three extramarital affairs. Only a minority—about one out of five—told of having four or more extramarital affairs during the last seven years of their marriage.

However, the age factor does not say the number of the married women's infidelities, but rather it appears to be the much more negative with which they embark on their illicit affairs. In this sense, the statement that a goodly number of American housewives are "pale over" appears to have a rather reliable degree of validity.

PSYCHOLOGISTS were more vocal and the case histories of the women interviewed during the Psychoanalytical Assistance Foundation survey agree that this phenomenon is quite readily explainable. Careful analysis of the case histories indicates that, in the majority of instances, the psychological dynamics underlying infidelity fall into one or another of five distinct and identifiable categories.

In other words, there are five principal reasons why married women don't only use men, but also cheat on them—why they are "pale over." All are familiar to psychotherapists and psychologists—and they are ranked the five most prevalent sex problems faced by mid-twentieth-century women.

These sex problems are listed and discussed below in order of their importance as determined by the Psychoanalytical Assistance Foundation survey.

1. Unfulfilled Affections

This is the most frequently cited reason for what one writer has termed the "female infidelity."

of many married women.

At Dr. Edward Feshbach of the New York State University Medical College has pointed out:

"The satisfaction of [sexual] partial appetites is essential for mental health. Many neurotic types could be alleviated if people were taught to develop a 'sound self-interest,' to feel neither guilty about the appetites nor to suppress them to an unconsciously great degree."

In children, the compensatory sexual relationship for the suppression of satisfaction of appetites is known as "transference values." A child experiencing a disappointment or loss, and unable to express it through normal appetites, often resorts to neuroticities. This is especially common in instances when the disappointment is birth—whether real or imagined—of a desire to possess the child's need for growth and demonstration of love. Masochism provides a form of outlet for the appetites, a sense of pleasure—in itself, rather.

Partial partners are to be found in adults. For example, a wife may—like whatever reason—feel that she has been half disappointed or slighted by her husband. She feels angry and resentful but suppresses and represses her natural inclination to express her emotions by becoming openly angry and spiteful or quarrel with her husband. She may be afraid to do so, or she may simply not want to "cause a scene." There are many other reasons which may cause her to suppress her appetites—but she does suppress them.

The suppression of the appetites, inevitably causes emotional stresses and strains. These in turn, create a strong and urgent need for the fulfillment of the libido—for the expression of the sexual appetites through sexual outlet.

The wife here by controlled emotions is aroused sexually—and, as this, may be caused by a very high state of sexual frustration. But her aggressive feelings toward her husband are bottled up inside her. Her repressed anger and re-constant approval her husband makes it impossible for her to obtain the necessary sexual outlet with him.

THERE IS WHAT CAN BE termed as a near-depressed state in the release of her husband and satisfaction of her physical desires, the wife seems ready to abandon them. Her wife have little or no real satisfaction for him. His only real life quality may be that he is available at the moment. His wife may be an experimental affair with the man—on other words a supply of love during and which beyond giving her outlet for her suppressed aggressions, provides her with an emotional satisfaction. Quite to the contrary it generally means her to feel depressed and backslid with guilt feelings afterwards like the behavior pattern is almost exactly parallel to that of the child who seeks "solace" in masturbation.

In the case of the wife she does not seek "mastering outlet" but "sexual outlet" through an adult sex relationship.

1. Femalely

A term broadly applied to describe various forms and manifestations of the inferiority men women feel because they are females. They envy the male (represented by the penis) and his dominance position in what the woman feel, a primarily a "male's world".

When used in the present context "penis-envy" denotes the envy and resentment which women feel because of what they believe to be their husbands' failure in coping in experimental affairs with their overweening deep masculine personalities and girls are.

Women in this category often become depressed with the idea that they are handicapped and ill-treated by the failure of their "inferiority" as women. To compensate for these failures and as help for their envy and resentment, they subconsciously strive to prove they are "every bit as good" as men. Their efforts in these directions are often usually frustrated.

These women will include an experimental effort to prove to themselves that they can do "any thing" their husbands can do. The fact that they can achieve the same level of sexual freedom which they rightly or wrongly believe their husbands enjoy and achieve provides them with considerable emotional satisfaction.

2. Femalely Popularity

A surprisingly large percentage of women are usually loyal only with certain men. In almost all such cases, the men with whom they are loyal are their husbands. Some authorities claim that no less than 50 percent of all married women fall into this category.

Women suffering from femalely popularity can achieve orgasm with men other than their husbands with great ease. The psychodynamics behind this parasexual situation can be traced back to the woman's early childhood and menarche.

A girl is sometimes taught that any form of sexual activity is a terrible sin. If the concept of the "holiness" of sex is deeply ingrained in her psyche her mind and emotions become conditioned to the idea that one can ONLY be sexually active when they have been led to believe are "moral circumstances".

There is no "hol" attached to sexual relations between husband and wife. The husband has the legal and moral right to indulge in sexual intercourse with his wife. Thus, the absence of "holiness" is almost an essential relationship—and the wife cannot achieve orgasm.

In early years, a girl engaging in premarital relations will reach a climax easily with a partner she loves intensely. After the wedding, the sex no longer interest against with him. Her relationship no longer "works" for her subconscious way of thinking.

But women suffering from femalely popularity encounter no difficulty in achieving orgasm with men with whom they have no emotional affairs. The element of "holiness" is once again present, the conditions the subconsciously believe to be the prerequisites for sexual satisfaction are once again present.

Women in this category exhibit an ethical attitude due to their sexual holiness. It is the only way they can obtain satisfactory outlet.

Psychotherapy as psychiatric counseling can almost always solve the problems of femalely popularity.

4. Poor Sexual Technique On Part of Husband

It has been estimated that as many as one-third of all adult males are unable to consistently maintain courses of sustained sexual activity long enough for their wives to achieve orgasm. Although the estimate is probably somewhat too high, the fact remains that many married women remain dissatisfied during coitus with their husbands for these reasons.

For too many men are clumsy, perfunctory and selfish in their intercourse. They may achieve their wives to a high level of sexual excitement, but fail to satisfy them.

Women whose husbands sexual techniques are inadequate frequently seek gratification in affairs with other men who are more adept at the art of love.

5. Poor Organic Motor Factors

A term denoting the lack of the feeling of love and emotions which some individuals experience after achieving orgasm. The feeling can last for only a few moments as it does in many cases, may prevent for days.

Women who experience strong and long-lasting feelings of love and emotions after achieving orgasm through sexual intercourse with their husbands sometimes seek to compensate for it by having affairs with other men. In almost all such instances, they lose

There is a great deal of information in this book, and it is not always easy to find what you need. The book is divided into three parts: the first part is a general introduction to the subject, the second part is a detailed description of the various types of systems, and the third part is a collection of case studies. The book is written in a clear and concise style, and it is easy to read. It is a good book for anyone who is interested in the subject of systems.

TEEN TEMPTRESS!!

ing to her mother died been doing since she was orphaned?

Like Harlow, Tinsley's exploits in the combination of risqué theatrics and an early physical development which resulted in a 36-24-36 figure at an age when most girls are still playing with dolls has this doll seems born for playing another kind of game. Or perhaps it was just childish competitiveness that repeatedly caused her to answer a knock at her hotel door with the statement in a long-eyed snarl that "I forget I hadn't worn my pajamas last night." In the time it took her to make the explanation, the night agent every once and while of Tinsley's home.

But it was all a big joke to Tinsley who has publicly stated that their "looking forward to going for dramatics" game is "a waste of real time now." No wonder Danny Kaye once characterized her as "three-year-old—going on twenty-eight!"

IN THE BLAZE OF HER OWN publicity Tinsley's shift in that glamorous lightness—about Fred Flinn once remarked in "Jet" that "in many states of this country when a male over 24 has relations with a female under 18, even with her full and enthusiastic consent, the law says he is guilty of the crime of statutory rape. Living in the spotlight of publicity cameras and that Tinsley will never be involved in the enforcement of such a law. Indeed, although she cannot say strongly both publicly and privately as to how he knows, Tinsley may still be in jail and close as Mickey's friends wish.

The thing is that her blatant flaunting of her charms points up the threat of other perhaps more innocent women before. For example, a few years back a 17-year-old got pregnant statutory rape charges against an 18-year-old boy in a New York court. Defense counsel pleaded to prove that the girl had been a working prostitute from the age of 15 that she had consented the boy voluntarily had relations with her and they would a perfect after the Vice Squad stepped into the hotel room they were occupying. Nevertheless, the law was clear. The girl was underage the boy was not, his age amounted to one in five years or just 1/5.

And, but there are the rules a man lives when he gets himself involved with a nymphomaniac. And they are apt to be even greater when he steps a woman, either then or afterward. Certainly as girl-child was none of an amateur then the headline-making Cheryl Crane.

A few years back Cheryl's celebrity ended in death. Johnny Weissmuller, a gentleman elephant who'd been playing house with her south on Long Beach, just 24 violent death provided a high point to the sex hysteria of the 1930's. And last, it marked the beginning of the same kind of cover for Cheryl.

There were whispers, rumors that Weissmuller and Cheryl may have had their own honeymooning honeymoon behind Long Beach but following the scandal and Cheryl's return from a home for delinquent girls all was forgiven, and forgotten. Cheryl settled down to live the life of a "normal teen-ager" with Mickey and her life buddy, Fred May. Soon thereafter however the "normal teen-ager" stepped on a few headstrong wild party that got out of hand it was ended by the police. And then, another long time and May split up to the unexpected rumor that once again Cheryl had possibly been peeking on Mickey's amateur activities.

True or not, the fact is that Cheryl has moved out of Long's home, moved into an apartment she shared with another girl and embarked on a career that found her a full fledged, even if strictly local, sex kitten. The place she picked for her debut is a cheapie every called the "Buccaro" on Sunset Strip. Here with one other girl, she does it, not which calls for a chargeover from bathing suits to champagne and then when the show is over and the ladies have been covered with a dress Cheryl often makes both to make the most of some of the wider Hollywood parties.

Here she is quite popular with the more mature Hollywood playboys who she has developed a reputation. They find that she not only old looking but years—but frequently beyond them.

That would seem to be a system which may be applied to all sex kittens, and just Cheryl. If there are elements in her story that sound more like "The Bad Girl" than "Lola" why then there are the same elements in the character of many of the sex kittens. All are Hollywood celebrities girl, "these little girls are naughty!"

We might add that there's particularly consider an image that which leads on to end with a bit of advice. Don't come your first time until you come to them—and if you're sure, don't come to them at all.

THE "BLACK KEY" SCANDALS OF SEX-MAD MUNICH

of masochists and homosexuals."

A collection of paraphernalia books and pictures was also found along with high-heeled boots, chains, whips and leathered ropes. A cabinet filled with cocaine pills, heroin powder and a variety of aphrodisiacs was also among the more salacious.

And, most surprising and condemning of all—the full list of the sex phobias participation was found in a small black ledger along with the "list" they had paid to enter the "sadomaso" circle and their monthly dues. All revealed—and the name of Mickey involved were staggering—were into the purchasing list for drugs, devices and aphrodisiacs.

The names involved ranked Munich's Max Karl Haas one of the city's top industrialists. Doctor Anton Reich, laboratory director at the Munich Museum Gesellschaft. Five digital films, well known in society as well for her charity fund raising programs—every single name on the list was that of a prominent, wealthy citizen.

Because I was one of the few "sex members" sent in their mail, she was also in full swing. I was asked to testify at the trial.

Your testimony will be provocative," explained Captain Mangler, "since you were so obviously not directly involved in the scandalous club."

AS YOU WERE, MANGLER, AND as the "club members" testified the game was literally up—or rather that their "partners" were finished—the horrifying story began to pour out. It lay out the details of what had happened after I left the Munich house last into a complete story of depraved, decadent sex.

Of course we were taking drugs," said one of the more infamous witnesses. "There is no other way to live. It myself helped Lisa give herself more of the aphrodisiac. This was leading her over for most of the time—obviously she needed a little stimulation."

done of God only knows how many days, the party's parties, were disappointed further and further in their actions as the hours went by. Lisa apparently checked the van "manno" for her mother's lover, and a light broke out between mother and daughter.

What exactly happened after that was never clearly established, but the last that was seen of Lisa Michals was the final note that ended in the boy's version. Several people testified to say that Lisa was dragged forcibly out of the party by her mother and her mother's lover. They had already drunk the girl with one of the backdrops that was later found outside in the garden, but the girl was never seen again until her mangled body was found in the graveyard.

When witnesses were asked why they had not intervened their answers always held in the same pattern.

"We do not believe in interfering in our group."

"One must always strange things in Morocco should I have asked nothing in somebody else's problem?"

"Yes then? Of course not—to wish his own type of pleasure?"

THE next morning for well over a month, nothing. Morocco's quiet town and quiet in horror after having spilled out in the fatal horrendous testimony. The girl disappeared for two days, then hand-drawn down a verdict of guilty to Franz Michals and her lover. They were convicted of "mistreatment while under the influence of narcotics," and sentenced to ten years hard labor.

I left Morocco shortly after the end of the trial, but I understood that even further months have been uncovered since then. It does not surprise me, since Kapitan Margot was emphatic in her desire to clean up Michals once and for all.

"My nearest intention to close my eyes to the debauchery and perversion that went around me" he declared. "The world from here has been ruled by the Black Key before my eyes and I will walk around the clock of tomorrow, but this must be cleared up—once and for all."

And, judging by the reports I've seen in recent newspaper pages, Kapitan Margot and his political career have been doing exactly that. ■■ where it suddenly into my kidney. The last-standing wave of pain rolled over me. I felt a roaring in my ears and the room began to spin. I heard a high pitched scream and recognized it as coming from my own throat. I reeled and toppled around the floor like a dying fish, writhing and vomiting in agony.

The door opened, suddenly. Margot Duran came in followed by her brother, Gerard.

The pain gradually receded and I was able to look in the women through eyes that were still burning. I saw in her face curves, the soft fullness of her lips, the slender hips. Then she got it. I loved the girl I wanted to marry. And this was the same girl who had not into the spot I was in right now?

Margot's face whitened when she saw my condition. "What did you do to him?" she asked. The Bell.

The big man scratched himself and shrugged his shoulders slightly. "Nothing much," he said. "He was talking too much and I shut him up."

One day passed so the two, Bell, the girl measured lower but her eyes to the floor.

GERARD had never returned my. I knew that the only reason to insist let The Bell tell me earlier was because of his sister. And if he could get the job done without her knowing what was responsible, he'd knock me off now. In a way, I couldn't blame him. As long as I was alive—even now with my hands and feet tied together—I was a powerful danger to him and his means otherwise.

I looked myself to speak, to try and convince them just how impossible it was. "There have been other attempts on the President's life," I said, finally. "And yet he is still with us. What makes you think that you will succeed?"

"Perhaps we will," Gerard admitted. "But then someone should stop. And if he fails, there'll be another attempt, and another. Eventually, your big General de Gaulle will be dead." He smiled a thoughtful smile of satisfaction. "But this is worse! It can do no good..."

"Then he just talking, again," The Bell said, watching himself. "What are you kids like, not the time? That should shut him up."

Margot sucked in her breath, deeply. "No!"

Gerard sighed. "Yes, now" he said, eagerly. Then he turned to me. "That would have been great! But I can't stop The Bell from, you know." He laughed. "But you don't understand..."

His face tensed suddenly into an ugly mask of rage. "No. It is you who do not understand!" he said, spitting the words out of his. "How could you understand? You are no longer one of us! You have decided that. You are a French!"

I looked back, surprised. He was right. I was no longer one of them.

I was one of them, once, however. I was born in Algeria, like they and the rest of the gang. I grew up, in fact, in a small house in suburban Genoa, just a few blocks from where Gerard and Margot Duran had lived.

All during my childhood, and through my teens, Gerard was my closest friend and his younger sister because my last girl I took Margot to her first dance gave her her first kiss under the palm trees and everything happened as to be married since I left the university and found a job.

The trouble was increasing in Algeria, but that didn't worry us. We had both in the paratroopers and the Foreign Legion. We knew Algeria would stay French.

Then, my whole world broke apart. Margot fell in love with a silver man and married him.

It was a whirlwind affair. They had eloped almost before knew what was happening.

Afterwards, she wrote me a note and tried to get me to meet her new husband, but I could not bear to look at her again. Gerard was sympathetic, but he was planning to be married himself and had little time for me.

I decided to leave for France and make a new life for myself there.

That was about a year and a half today, the Army put its tanks into action. They did it in order to save Algiers for France, but even the President realized that the only solution to the national problem was to give that country its freedom.

In Algeria, my former friends tell that they were sold out and began negotiating with a secret and dangerous movement.

In the meantime I had only occasional word of the Deputies. When I did hear that that good Margot and her husband had been captured by Arabs, the husband was killed and Margot heavily wounded by French snipers. As for General, I learned that his wife was murdered by the Arabs.

But that was all I tried to write to them, but could get no answer.

Then one day, suddenly I ran into Margot on a Paris street.

I took her to a small cafe where we sipped wine and she told me the story of what happened to her since we last met. I was not a pretty story. First her parents were killed in a bomb explosion. Then one day while coming back from visiting friends who lived at the outskirts of the city she and her husband were captured by Arab guerrillas.

Just for the hell of it they made her walk like was forced to parade around the town walls while her captives made filthy remarks and grabbed at her all day long.

Her husband could not take any more. He cursed and bang his head on the Arabs. One of them tossed a rifle and shot him down as cold blood.

Margot screamed and collapsed. She was not even able to get up a day when the men dragged her into a car and took her when he wanted with her.

She blinked out half way through the ordeal and then, going unconscious, being rescued. The last thing she could recall is waking up in an Army hospital with her brother standing by her bed.

From that point on, Margot, General and General's wife Catherine lived the Arabs with a heavy and dying hatred. Among who before that time had stood about from the middle between an important member of the European water-pipe movement and Margot and Catherine worked with him.

Then Catherine was killed and her brother and sister kept on with their fight.

"Finally our country was taken from us and we had to leave," she said, her eyes burning. "We were not thrown out by the Arabs, though. They never would have turned us out of our homes. We were betrayed by the Gaullists—by fellow Frenchmen."

I could sympathize with her, even though I couldn't agree. They were revolution and leaders on both sides and it seemed to me that the Gaullists never had been the only possible one. "Is my wife?" I told her, "you're in Paris now. Try to forget the past and make a new life."

"Forget?" she asked, scarcely "Never!"

"Well," I asked, "if you want to we help you forget at least you can allow me to share your pain."

I did take her around the town and for a while I even believed that I was starting to take her mind off the horror she had known in Algeria.

Then when we were alone in my room, and I was exploring the soft gentle curves of her naked body I asked her to marry me. At first I was certain she was going to say yes. Then something like a veil came over her eyes. "We must think of the war," she said. "Later perhaps." But not now. No, now we will be free."

"But why?"

"Stop asking questions," she said. "Just make love to me." She gripped my shoulder tightly and I lay back against her. Her full breasts pressed themselves against my chest and I forgot everything as a white-hot mass of passion.

I ASKED her several other times, but she still would not marry me. I was certain she loved me through. She talked about her earlier marriage, but I had the feeling she had not been happy with the man and had regretted the hasty decision before she and he parted in that case, and told me that I was the only man with whom she'd like to spend the rest of her life.

I had the feeling that it was General who was standing in the way of Margot and me. I had the feeling they were planning some thing together, though I didn't know what and that our marriage had to take second place to their project.

The attitude towards me had changed. At first he seemed delighted to see me again. It was

"What are you going to do?"

"Fall the authorities," I said.

"No."

I was half way through the door, but something in her voice made me stop and turn. Margot was pointing a small but deadly pistol at me.

"Don't make me do it," she said, her eyes troubled but calm. "I know you as much as any woman has ever loved a man. And for all I know, you may be right in what you say. But I want to you, I will pull the trigger if you try to leave this room."

MY INSULATED SOUL I know damn well the moment what she said. She ordered me to wait in front of her door in the bathroom and I didn't budge.

There Gerard showed his nerve and turned me over to The Bull. He seemed to be in the gang for the sheer love of violence and brutality. Gerard and the others were motivated by hatred and vengeance, but to The Bull these motives were secondary. He was there because he loved the taste of blood.

And I was at the mercy. Only a man who loved me about as much as I did and detested The Bull's law.

The other three members came into the room. "We must see you at once," one of them told Gerard. "There's been a change in the family plans."

Gerard nodded and left with them. I was alone with Margot and The Bull.

"Please believe me," the girl said, "I had to do what I did for Gerard. He could not stand being arrested again. He's crazy . . . the same brain. I did not want his hurt."

"What do you worry about him for?" The Bull asked, slowly. "After what they did to your brother?"

"Without any warning whatever, he came over and deliberately looked me in the eyes."

I remained and waited in the most uncomfortable spot I had ever known. My stomach twisted and I began crying up help on the cold office floor.

Margot screamed and bent her face back against The Bull's massive body. He merely laughed and swung his arm to the side. He drove back his face again and I choked back an interjection. Then there was a quiet thud as Margot staggered back and brought the barrel down hard on the back of his head. The Bull groaned and collapsed.

In brief seconds Margot was kneeling beside me, lifting my head with a small knife. She looked and told me that I was right, that the plan was an excellent one which refuted her brother's unproven wish now like The Bull.

"The nerve," she cried, bitterly.

With her help I made it to my feet. I was trembling with pain and every step was an agony, but I knew we had to get out of there before the others returned. "Let's go," I heard.

"All right."

Suddenly there was a noise behind us. When we turned around The Bull was standing there, shaking his head, grapply.

Margot tried to bring the little gun up, but The Bull was able to knock it out of her hand. She scrambled for it, but he caught her shoulders and threw her across to the other side of the room.

I have no reason to think that I was still feeling dirty and about as cold as a bag of nails as he roared his last-like hiss. I knew that if he could land one blow, I'd be done for. Instantly I looked with all my strength against his advance.

I felt the muscles crumple and The Bull's leg landed out from under him. He dropped and grabbed the nearest post, holding on to it and sobbing out curses. I put him out of his misery with a kick to the point of his jaw.

I turned to the girl but The Bull lay behind me up too long a time. Gerard and the others were staring at us.

Gerard's gun was level with my belly. "Get away from my sister!" he said.

I did what I was told.

"I've had all the trouble I'm going to have with you, Monsieur!" he said. "You're a valuable man. Take a last look at it—monster!"

"Don't . . ." Margot cried as a tortured voice.

"Keep out of this," her brother snapped. "I've talked to you long enough."

Gerard's fingers whitened as he started to squeeze the trigger. There was a sharp explosion, Gerard's face was a mask of complete surprise as he dropped the gun and slumped to the floor.

MARGOT'S FACE LOOKED what I said and she told the still smoking gun I was over and took the gun from her hand while she ran in her brother's robe. I held it steady on them as I planned the future and an afterthought.

Today, The Bull and the three other male members of the gang are safe in prison, but Gerard lives as he stands. He recovered from the gunshot wound, but his mind broke down completely. He is now in a mental institution about forty miles from Paris.

As for Margot and me—because of the girl's help the authorities pardoned her as my custody. However, it often seems more as if I was pardoned to her. We were married three months ago.

Nakhimov at the Libau naval base in the Baltic Sea after an unsuccessful attack on the Russian Far East fleet on May 13 of that year, an event of great importance in the Nakhimov's future history took place. The Capt. Nicholas II, registered a loan for his country of $40,000,000 francs equivalent to 10,000,000 pounds sterling, with the Banque de Paris et des Pays Bas, an organization of international banking houses associated with the treasury of various European governments. 20,000,000 pounds of this great loan was designated for use in purchasing supplies, equipment, and armaments for the Russian Far East fleet in the war with Japan.

On October 15, 1904 that $40,000,000 pounds sterling, equivalent to between $50 and $60 million, was loaned through the Admiral Nakhimov for transport to the Far East. The Admiral Nakhimov left the Libau naval base and joined the Russian fleet then marching for the coast to Pacific waters. Her mission was not to engage in battle, but to safely transport the treasure in her hold to its destination and under no circumstances, to allow it to fall into the hands of the enemy. For the money for the Far East the treasure had been converted into foreign gold sovereigns.

DOCUMENTATION FOR THE authenticity and existence of this transaction between a gold 200 tons below the surface of the waters of the Tsushima Straits at the hold of the Admiral Nakhimov can be found in numerous legitimate and unapproachable sources. The New York World Telegram & Sun published the following report on page 187 of its The World Almanac for 1912: "1905—May 16. Russian battle group, Admiral Nakhimov, sunk in fight with Japan's fleet in Bay of Tsushima; loss of his unknown. The vessel carried 151,000,000 in gold."

In "The Japan Russia War," by Sidney Tyler, it is stated on page 254 that "Russia suffered a loss of approximately million dollars in gold" when one of six ships went down as the result of heavy action in the Bay of Tsushima in May of 1905.

On page 178 of "The War in the Far East," by Charles O'Connor Ferguson, it is stated that on May 15, 1904, a Russian loan of $40,000,000 francs (10,000,000 pounds sterling) was raised by the Banque de Paris group.

As early as 1928, a salvage operation headed by Anthony Karam, president of the Japanese Maritime Deep Diving Research Institute of Japan, was started to go after the approximately 150 million in the hold of the Admiral Nakhimov for the organization has been unsuccessful. Known as the Pacific Far East Salvage Company Inc., this organization issued a prospectus in 1948, announcing additional investment in a salvage operation. Much of the information that follows is based on material in this prospectus offering to the reader when he was invited to participate in the venture. The material substantiates the existence of the vast hoard of gold under 200 feet of water in the Straits of Tsushima.

Just as Hans Germany visited the wreckage of its ship, known as Goeben, in the British Embassy at Constantinople, of the city and place visited by the Allies to their invasion of Europe in Germany—so did the Imperial Army and Navy of Japan upon the information supplied by their own intelligence agents during the Russo-Japanese War of 1905. Gen. and Colonel Maunier of the Japanese Army Intelligence Bureau, reported that his agency had obtained from intelligence that a Russian ship had sailed from Libau, loaded with gold coins valued at 20 million pounds sterling. This intelligence was quoted by the Japanese command.

The fact that the Admiral Nakhimov wrecked rapidly in the battle of Tsushima Straits, although she was one of the best equipped and most heavily armed in the Russian fleet, and attempted to run her speed of 14 knots to escape the engagement at a distance of historical record. Her strange flight from battle confirms the fact of her mission, and the contents of the passenger cases in her hold.

We have already told the story of the chase after the Russian cruiser, and in closing by two Japanese destroyers with two torpedo boats on May 21, 1905. In addition, we have described the determination of the Russian navigation officer and his troops to deny access to the lower third deck to the boarding party of Japanese marines. But well known however, is the fact that approximately of the Russian treasure's crew were loaded by these Japanese on the Mitsu Maru at the Tsushima Straits. These men had in their possession English gold coins valued by their captives as being equivalent to 250,000 yen in value.

On December 22-23, 1905, the Russians were informed by the Japanese head men of the local village Japanese officials and soldiers forwarded him with the information that they ship had gone down with a large cargo of gold coins number in the area they possessed. They said he would be well rewarded if he returned those coins from their ship.

The officer in command of the Admiral Nakhimov when she went down, was Captain Kuznetsov, and subsequently reported to his native Russia. In one of his reports to the Russian high command, the following statement was made: "I saw the things which I was bringing to you, with the 'Admiral Nakhimov' in 90 tons out of one and they can never be utilized by the enemy."

The National Archives of Japan contain a telegram sent on October 18, 1904 by Hayashi Gonsuke, Japanese Representative to Britain to the Japanese government. In that telegram is a reference of the following summary of intelligence material gathered by Gonsuke's agent: "When the Russian fleet sailed eastward it was decided that the funds by the government of the Russian Far East Fleet would be carried with it. The Russian government stored funds at Berlin and Paris. At Paris the gold was valued 200,000,000 francs and at Berlin the gold was valued 200,000,000 marks. This money was exchanged for British gold coins which have already been loaded aboard ship."

The Pacific Far East Salvage Company Inc. began salvage operations on the Admiral Nakhimov in 1925. Methods for working

At the same time, a bright light flared across the submarine. The captain's face was pale as his boots and his muscles were writhed deeply as that same time and his mind was that of a shell.

"Here," the captain shouted down the tube—Coach dead! The German sailors were still at the machine gun, but this was the captain's last communication. Dierke staggered back from the side of the conning tower. Suddenly she started yelling, and her pale arms in the short puffs of her uniform skirt were waving wildly on her hips.

Vice President Spiro Agnew leaped down the ladder into the deep Johnny Ray brand's hole, knowing that he was bleeding to death and that he could not last much longer. There was only one last thing to be wanted to do. He did not want to see the clinic with Dr. Jones. If that was the end for him and the job, he wanted the Blues to join the party, also, especially the doctors.

With a mighty effort, he struggled out his right foot and stuck it under the tight cover part of the capstan, jamming it over him below. The man never dropped down on his leg and Will heard his bones cracking under the impact. The pain was like a flame that drilled through the leg and up his spine. The capstan was pushing at Will's leg, trying frantically to push the crushed flesh out of the way so that he could climb the hatch. But he couldn't budge it. The leg was mangled against the breast plate.

The job was going down rapidly now, and water was beginning to spill over the concrete tower. Debris, a crying, dead, burned-in, faded purple when the water had subsided, lay matted and now and quickly scattered it, and now the narrow window at the Wall John, and on his pass he was getting the last. There he would be dead.

In the same light of the article, further down, Johnson concluded with detachment as the captain, from below, began to step away at his job with a hatchet trying to cut off enough logs and limbs so that he could close the cover before it was too late. At first, Johnson hardly felt the pain, and he saw the flames sink deeper and deeper into his complicated back. But then, suddenly, the pain overtook him with a quick male and the same moment while gulped into the burning power cord. Before Johnson reached to it deeply, hopping for the first, one death at drowning, he saw the dark water rise over his head a few, his body

THAT TALENTED AND AFFECTIONATE that he had been unconscious for three days after they fished him out of the water. His leg had been in straits, he had lost some blood there was one mortally wound. The ship doctor on the radio, cheer performed in desperation when the vessel appeared full speed up Miami beach. There was nothing they could do to save the cat!

There was no doubt that all went aboard the German submarine were dead. At the last moment von Schmiedelagen must have noticed the folly of trying to close the hatch as Will jammed a leg and he gave orders to surface. At that moment, the wall of water pouring through the hatch caught him off the balance; the submarine slowly tilted, rocking down onto the black depths, and the Nazi's sinking just as red Mexico was flooded. All that remained of it was a waterlogged hull with ropes flailing round it, bumping against each other.

The suit was passed after the war and Johnson went down to the Navy Yard on his moral leg when they brought her in. It was a more serious on his part, his eyes peered the meaning home, but he knew there would be no [illegible] had to it. There was nothing left of the lovely [illegible]—[illegible] but a faded memory of the
